What do we mean when we discuss diversity? This unit explores the depiction of minorities, women, and the elderly, among others, in modern media and media from 30 years ago. The great difference between the eras allows diversity to be discussed more easily. (Created By: Travis Willard Created Date: 05/22/2006 Updated By: Sharon Joiner Updated Date: 02/20/2007)

Activity # 1

- Provide students with an assortment of picture/story books, young adult books, magazines, catalogs, TV guides, newspapers, etc. Be sure many of the selections have copyrights dating at least back into the early 1970s; items ten or twenty years older would be even better. (Check school and public libraries for available materials.)
- Students should be placed in groups and asked to examine the books and record the following: races and cultures represented, how women were portrayed, how families looked, roles/jobs portrayed, how the elderly are portrayed.
- After sufficient time, the groups are to share aloud their findings.
- Categorize findings according to age of material and media.

Extension Activity:

Students could be assigned a media journal for a week in which they record the number and types of diversity evidenced on the radio, TV, in newspapers, and in periodicals.
